You may not be aware of it, but behind the scenes the subconscious is working 24 hours a day recording everything that happens to you. It is also recording responses to given triggers. If you feel fear or apprehension, this is because your subconscious has registered some resistance to doing whatever it is that you are trying to do. Your failures and your successes therefore depend upon changing the patterns that exist and making them into more positive patterns. Habits become habits because you are presented with triggers that in turn require some action on your part. You will repeat your actions, making them into habits but habits are a little more complex than that. In the opening chapter of this book, we will look at the way in which habits are formed, because having a better understanding of the process will help you to change bad habits into more productive ones. Stuck in a rut? Find yourself always looking at the cup half full? Habits can do that. It is true that habits formed can be sometimes hard to break. This is good if the habits are positive, but certainly not if they are bad. What I find most useful in this book is that it has made some discussions that clearly defined what habits are and how one can develop strong and positive ones to help him get that positive change. The book also said that habits become habits because we're given triggers that evoke actions from us. When repeated, they become habits. And knowing which must continued and which must be stopped is the crucial part. But I think this book is helpful in this department.

I was looking for such a book! The clarity and wisdom that shines through this presentation of what could be a very clinical approach to scientific understanding is a credit to the way in which the author has integrated years of research and study into the authors own experience of life. And able to share this practical application and uplift net with her readers. I especially enjoyed how you can use these neuro chemicals to reinforce new habits and making changes in your life. The book provides a section on how to do just that. I've read countless psychology books and very few are as interesting, memorable, straightforward.

I still remember when I was in college, my professor said to me that 'Once you created a habit it will be hard for you to eliminate or to get out of that habit, so you better choose the best habit which you'll never gonna regret why you created it'; which is really true! Many years have passed I haven't noticed that I have created bad habits so I purchased this book to learn how to eliminate the bad one and to develop a positive and strong habits! And I'm very much thankful that I came upon this book!
